USDA provides guidance on accommodating children with special dietary needs, supported by the USDA nondiscrimination regulation allowing for substitutions or modifications in the National School Meals Program for children whose disabilities restrict their diet as certified by a licensed physician. The school nutrition service staff members also should consider making food substitutions for students with food allergies, for students with food intolerances, or on a case-by-case basis for students who are medically certified as having a special medical dietary need. The school environment should support students with disabilities and chronic health conditions in being physically active and making healthy eating choices.
